Leads still being pursued in child's murder

Grandmother: Are children safe?

By Beth L. Chester
Staff Writer

Is there a random killer on the loose - one who kills for no reason? Early in the investigation into Levi Frady's murder, officials tried to ease parents' fears that someone might be stalking Forsyth County children.

Just days after the 11-year-old's body was found, Dawson County Sheriff Billy Carlisle told worried parents that statistics in child homicide cases indicate that young victims usually die at the hands of someone they know.

But with time passing without an arrest in the murder, Levi's maternal grandmother questions whether other children in Forsyth are safe from Levi's assailant.

In a written statement, Janice Hamby poses the question: "Are your children safe at the bus stop? There's a killer out there somewhere," she writes. "They have killed once, and it will be easier the next time."

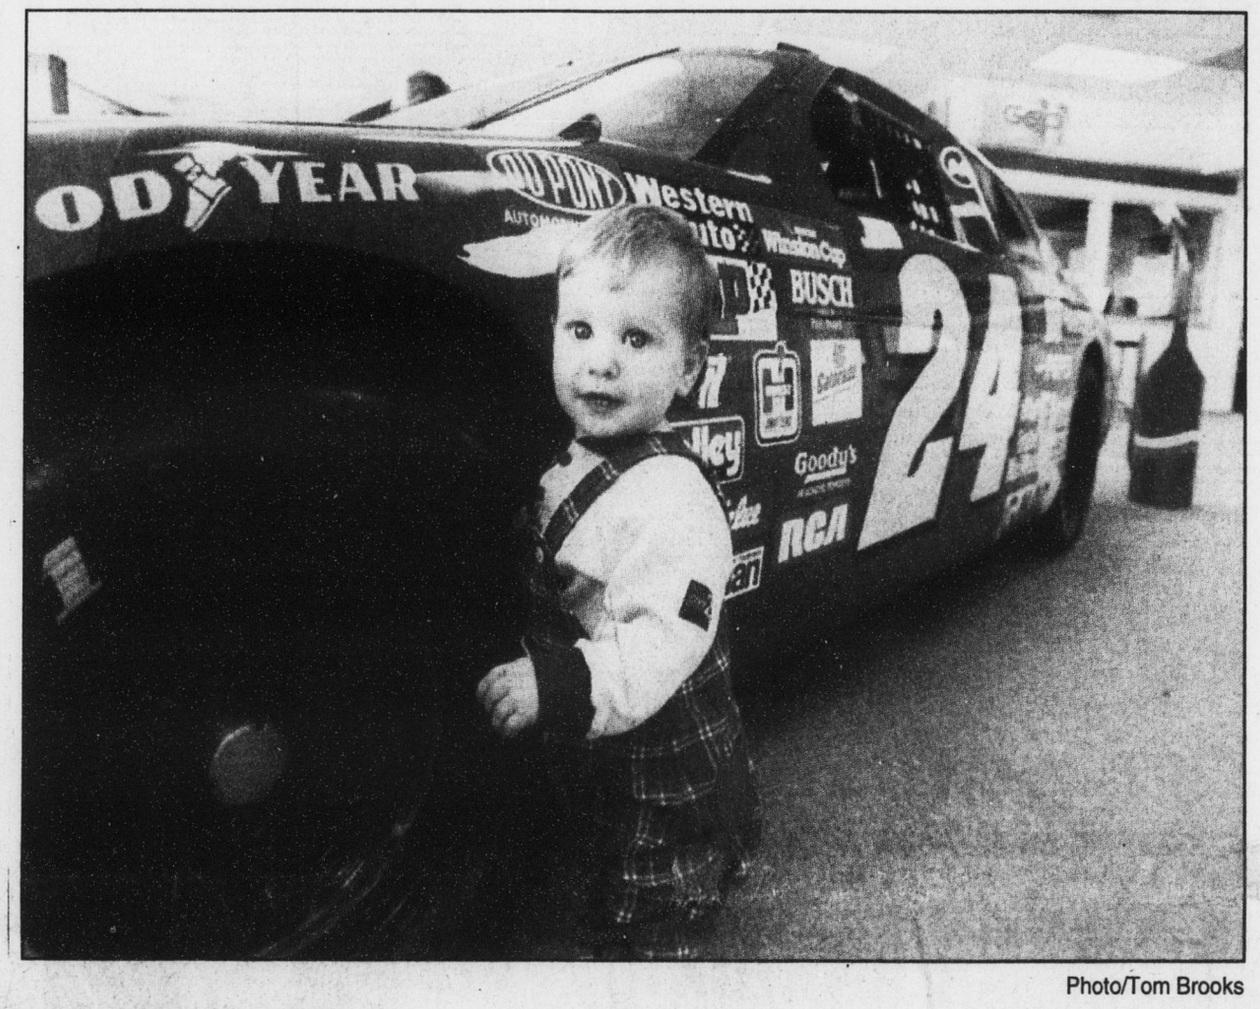

Even when Carlisle generalized about child murders, he was quick to add that no judgment was being made about Levi's murder specifically, saying he did not know for certain whether Levi had known his killer.

The grandmother wonders whether parents shouldn't be taking extra precautions until the murderer is found, saying she thinks it's possible Levi did not know his killer. "We just don't know right now. It could have happened either way," she said.

Because of the uncertainty, she doesn't want parents to have a false sense of security. "I don't want to scare anyone. I just want them to be cautious until the murderer is found. If one child can be killed, another child could be killed.

"A child should be allowed to play," she writes, but points out that parents should not assume the person living next door or down the street is safe. "Do you (really) know your neighbor?"

Tyke testing the tires
For 15-month-old Jonathon Harden of Cumming, the wheels of this replica of the Chevrolet Monte Carlo in which racer Jeff Gordon won the 1995 Winston Cup championship, measure up about head-high. The colorful car was on display at Andean Chevrolet on Friday. Gordon was running in this weekend's NAPA 500. Earlier in the week, a simulator was also at Andean. More pictures on Page 8A.

Jury deliberates at retrial of grocer's alleged murderer

Evans

Testimony and closing arguments in the murder retrial of one of three men convicted in the brutal 1991 slaying of a Cumming grocery store manager have come to a close, and a Hall County jury will begin deliberations in the case Monday morning.

When opening statements began Nov. 5, Chief Trial Assistant District Attorney Lee Darragh told jurors that 23-year-old Keith Lloyd Evans was "ambushed" on a Saturday night in April as he drove home to Dawson County after getting off from work at the Cumming Food Center on Hwy. 9.

Land use panel sets its future goals

By Sheri Toomey
Staff Writer

The 10-member panel chosen to revamp the county's master land has selected 10 goals for future implementation.

The goals are:

1. Encourage public/private partnerships.
2. Develop strategy for citizen involvement.
3. Provide efficient, equitable and compatible land use.
4. Provide a balanced diversity of land use while maintaining private property rights of individuals to develop their properties.
5. Encourage and develop patterns and practices that strengthen a sense of community.
6. Encourage creative and flexible site design.
7. Encourage non-automotive modes of transportation.
8. Create a system of public recreation and cultural spaces.
9. Encourage conservation, preservation or redevelopment of buildings, neighborhoods, or areas of historical, architectural or cultural significance.
10. Protect and preserve the beauty and integrity of natural features, i.e., trees, slopes, streams and lakes.

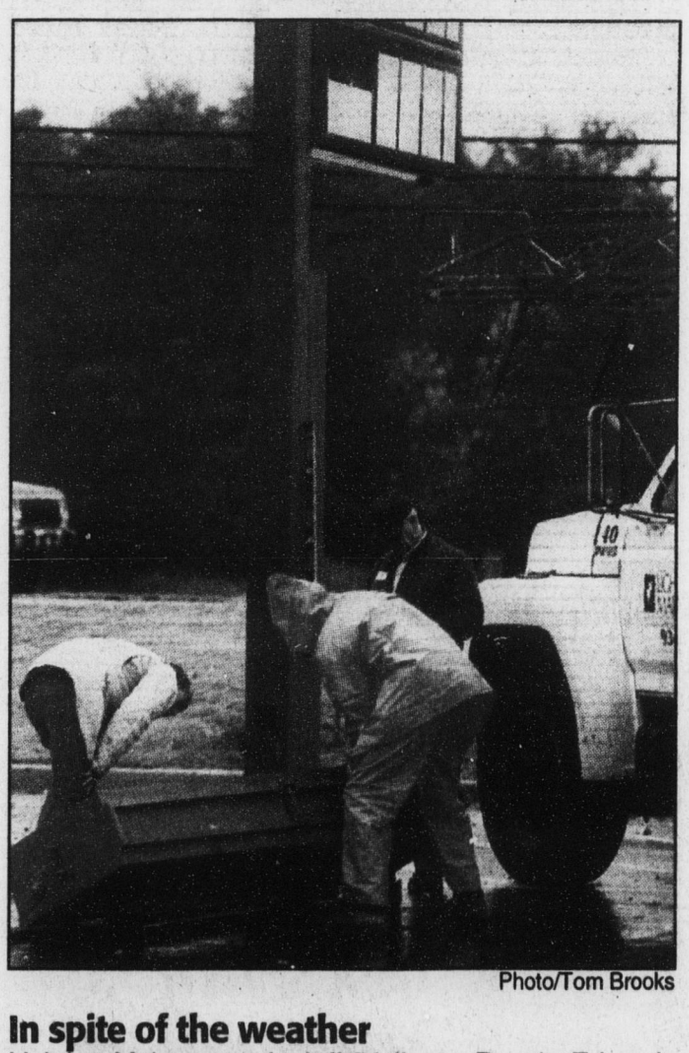

The panel has accepted the inventory and analysis done by Robert & Co., the Atlanta firm hired to prepare the plan, which was rejected by the Forsyth County Commission in July for further revision.

The Department of Community Affairs issues a list of guidelines for the six elements required in comprehensive planning, said planner Gretchen Biestman. The panel has developed goals and last week developed a strategy for implementation of the first one. This Monday, the panel will focus on a strategy for getting citizens involved in the planning process.

The panel devised the following strategy for implementing the first goal, encouraging cooperation between public and private entities, which includes eight objectives:

1. Use incentives for private infrastructure development.
2. Encourage economical expansion of public services through development design.
3. Use alternative modes of transportation to connect commercial, industrial and residential areas.

Plan to organize county records to be developed

By Sheri Toomey
Staff Writer

The Board of Commissioners Monday approved funding for a coordinator and consultant to develop a plan for managing county records.

Commission clerk Patty Whatley was appointed as coordinator with an annual salary of $8,000. Donna Parrish was appointed as the consultant to Whatley as an aid to implement the records management plan.
