LEGACY from 1A

Investigation.

Hamby and her family still believe the person responsible for Levi's death can be found.

"This has got to be eating at somebody, so much so it affects your breathing with a heavy heart as it does ours," she wrote. "God is the ultimate judge and God only knows."

"We know Levi was calling for help and we can't get the sound out of our ears."

Hamby said Levi's mother, Marilyn Hamby, and father, Milton Frady, still live in Forsyth County, though they are not together.

Levi's twin sister Laci, now 21, lives with Janice Hamby.

Levi was last seen a decade ago on his bicycle leaving his friend's house on Noah Road, not far away from his Burrus Mill Road home.

His bike and some shell casings were found in a ditch off Little Mill Road.

GBI agent John Cagle, who is handling the Frady case, declined last week to comment on whether any new evidence or methods had surfaced over the past decade.

"Anytime a case is that old, any case of this age has obstacles," Cagle said. "We try to work through those and stay focused."

Cagle said the GBI has remained in contact with Frady's family, including his mother and sister.

Nearly five years after his death, Georgia established Levi's Call in his memory.

The emergency alert system represents a partnership of state law enforcement, emergency management and news outlets.

Levi's Call, the state's version of the Amber Alert, notifies the public immediately after a confirmed child abduction.

"Whenever a Levi's Call or an Amber Alert is issued, it kicks into play many different ways of getting out the message of the missing child," Cagle said. "Prior to that, we didn't have a method to do that."

John Bankhead, spokesman for the Georgia Crime Information Center, said children have been found alive 66 of the 68 times Levi's Call has been enacted.

The other two children, Bankhead said, had died prior to the alert.

Moss, who continues to work with the GBI on the matter, said Forsyth County has not had another case of an abducted child since Levi's murder.

"It's still an active investigation and there is information coming in regularly," he said. "We refer that information to the GBI.

"We take any missing kid case very seriously. We are reminded that anything can happen."
